

HUBERT EVANS is known to Canadian writers as "the elder of the tribe", a tribute both to the man and to his work, carried out over a great many years, sometimes under conditions of adversity such as his near-blindness. Milton's poem, "On His Blindness" spoke of "that one talent which is dead" (1:1) . . .

Evans, by will and by faith, has not hidden that talent but has continued to develop