

It is with distinct pleasure, Madam Chancellor, that I present this country's chief accountant, Mr. Kenneth Dye, Auditor General of Canada. Now in the final months of a ten-year appointment, the tenacity with which he prosecutes his role as Parliament's watchdog has done much to cull out waste and inefficiency in government spending. "He that goeth about to persuade a multitude that they are not so well governed as they ought to be" it has been said "shall never want attentive and favourable hearers." We hear through Kenneth Dye's voice that value for money is one charge laid on our governors by a free society.

A Vancouver native, Kenneth Dye became a Chartered Accountant in 1962 and a partner in the national accounting firm of Campbell Sharp four years later. He returned to school to amplify and refresh his management skills, graduating in 1971 at the age of 35 from Simon Fraser University's first Master of Business Administration class. His distinguished private sector career included appointment as President of the Institute of Chartered Accountants of British Columbia and as Governor of the Canadian Institute. Mr. Dye is one of a select few Canadians to
