be updated and improved (at a future meeting). As part of a re through talks or mentorship programs would be rewarding. For example, recipients of research awards often give public talks, but teaching award winners do not, reflecting the perception that research is celebrated more than teaching. Another idea is to create a fellowship group that grows annually by invitation to award recipients only. The fellowship group can be consulted for university-level decisions about teaching where mentorship is also available to instructors. Other tangible award suggestions were developmental grants and professional development programs that focus specifically on the practice of teaching.

The logistics and nomination process were discussed for awards. The current nomination process is cumbersome leading to some people not bother nominating, and thus should be changed. A subcommittee may be formed later to determine ToR, criteria, structure, and logistics of the new awards. Currently, several SFU Faculties and departments have their own awards. Two that do not currently have awards are EENV and FCA. Elizabeth will reach out to the Deans of these faculties.
